

Mother Heartbreak: A Raw and Unflinching Look at the Pain of Losing a Child

Losing a child is the most unimaginable pain that a parent can experience. It is a pain that is so deep and so raw that it can feel like it will never go away. In her new memoir, Mother Heartbreak, Sarah O'Brien shares her personal story of losing her son, Sam, to cancer. She writes about the overwhelming grief, the anger, the guilt, and the loneliness that she felt in the wake of his death. But she also writes about the love, the hope, and the resilience that she found in the midst of her pain.

An Excerpt from Mother Heartbreak

"I remember the day Sam was diagnosed with cancer like it was yesterday. I was sitting in the doctor's office, holding his hand, and listening to the doctor tell us that he had a tumor in his brain. I couldn't believe it. My little boy had cancer. How was that possible?

The next few months were a blur of doctor's appointments, chemotherapy, and radiation treatments. Sam was so brave through it all. He never complained, and he always had a smile on his face. But I could see the toll that the cancer was taking on him. He was losing weight, and his energy was starting to fade.

One day, Sam came to me and said, 'Mom, I'm scared.' I held him close and told him that I was scared too, but that we were going to get through this together. We would fight this cancer together.

But we didn't. Sam died a few months later. He was only six years old.

I was devastated. I couldn't believe that my precious little boy was gone. I felt like my heart had been ripped out of my chest. I didn't know how I was going to go on without him.

But I had to go on. I had other children to take care of. I had to find a way to live again.

It wasn't easy, but I did it. I found strength in my other children. I found strength in my friends and family. And I found strength in my faith.

I will never forget Sam. He will always be my little boy. But I know that he is in a better place now. He is free from pain and suffering. And I know that one day I will see him again.
