

The Boshin War and Satsuma Rebellion: Men-at-Arms 530

A Comprehensive Guide to Japan's Pivotal Conflicts

The Boshin War (1868-1869) and the Satsuma Rebellion (1877) were pivotal conflicts in Japan's history. These wars marked the end of the Tokugawa shogunate and the beginning of the Meiji Restoration. They also led to the establishment of a modern Japanese army and the transformation of Japan into a major world power.

The Boshin War

The Boshin War was a civil war fought between supporters of the Tokugawa shogunate and those who supported the restoration of the emperor. The war began in 1868 when imperial forces attacked a shogunate army at Toba-Fushimi. The shogunate forces were defeated and the emperor was restored to power. The war continued for several months as shogunate forces resisted in various parts of the country. However, the imperial forces were victorious and the shogunate was overthrown.

The Satsuma Rebellion

The Satsuma Rebellion was a rebellion led by Saigō Takamori, a former samurai who had fought for the imperial forces during the Boshin War. Saigō and his followers were dissatisfied with the Meiji government's policies and they believed that the government was not doing enough to modernize Japan. In 1877, Saigō and his followers rose up in rebellion. The rebellion was brutally suppressed by the government and Saigō was killed in battle.
