A Tangible Symbol of Trauma and Triumph

The Witness Blanket is an awe-inspiring art installation that embodies the horrors endured by Indigenous children in Canada's residential school system. Created by renowned Indigenous artist Carey Newman, this blanket is crafted from over 800 items donated by residential school survivors, including clothing, artwork, and personal belongings.

Each item tells a unique story of suffering and resilience, revealing the profound impact of these institutions on generations of Indigenous families. Through this tangible representation, The Witness Blanket unveils the truth about the horrors of residential schools, shedding light on a dark chapter in Canadian history.

A Catalyst for Healing and Reconciliation

Beyond its role as a historical record, The Witness Blanket has become a powerful catalyst for healing and reconciliation. Its national tour has sparked important conversations, fostering greater understanding and empathy between Indigenous and non-Indigenous communities.

By witnessing the artifacts and hearing the stories behind them, visitors are confronted with the realities of residential schools and the ongoing legacy of trauma faced by Indigenous peoples. This confrontation creates a space for healing and reconciliation, promoting a deeper understanding and appreciation of Indigenous culture and experiences.
